Rhoads Hall
Bryn Mawr College (125th Anniversary)

“In the fall of 1885, Bryn Mawr opened its doors to thirty-six young women whose initial faculty included Paul Shorery, Charlotte Angus Scott, Edward Keiser, Edward Washburn, and Woodrow Wilson. In the years that followed, M. Carey Thomas fought to strengthen the intellectual quality of Bryn Mawr’s faculty and academic offerings and demanded a new architectural setting as an appropriate symbol of the life within. The Jacobean quadrangles that emerged at Bryn Mawr at the turn of the century gave new architectural expression to the women’s college.

“In 1885, this lay still in the future. Bryn Mawr opened with its building and its academic programs premised on incompatible notions of higher education for women. University training of the highest quality, modeled after Johns Hopkins, took place in college buildings designed to look like Smith in the dress of a Quaker lady. Taylor and Merion remain today as reminders of the original intention of the founder. They symbolize the opposition M. Carey Thomas faced as she turned what began as a Quaker college for women into a secular and cosmopolitan institution.”

Helen Lefkowitz Horowitz, author of “Alma Mater” (Knopf, 1984)
