We create a box model for a random process when we make an analogy between doing the process and drawing tickets at random from a box.

The tickets in the box have labels corresponding to the possible outcomes of the process, and the proportion of tickets with a particular label is equal to the probability of the outcome associated with that label.

The labels we choose depend on our point of view.