I know it’s really hard for international students to be in a country which is completely unknown. When I was a first year student, I received a lot of help, especially from ISO assistants, and I want to return the help to the incoming class.

I was always slow on adjusting to new environments even though I had moved around to different countries and had to adapt to new surroundings. I understand what it is like to be in a new environment and could help new comers to feel more comfortable.

As an incoming first-year student, I received a lot of help from ISO assistants not only in terms of getting my paper work done but also in terms of sharing their experiences. I believe that their assistance was one of the greatest contributors to my assimilation process.

I came to the U.S as an international student when I was sixteen, and I hold a great passion to help the coming international students get along with this foreign and unknown community soon and better.

As an international student, I gained a lot of help from the orientation process and our lovely assistants. I want to give back and make an effort to help the incoming students adjust and thrive in a new environment.

Please keep in mind that it is okay to be afraid, but that is just the first step, dare to go beyond that unto the next and the next step. As the late Nelson Mandela said, “It always seems impossible until it’s done.”

When I entered the college, during ISO I felt the passion, happiness and love from all ISO assistants; and by their patience and efforts, I was finally ready for my college life.

I received a lot of help from the upper-class students when I first came here, and their willingness to help really made me feel safe and supported. I would like to create a heart-warming and welcoming atmosphere for the incoming students and to help them settle in and begin their college life smoothly.

‘It’s not the school that defines who you are, but yourself.” I believe everyone; especially international students who choose Bryn Mawr have their own unique reasons. I would like to tell them to feel free to be themselves.
